In Conventional Chinese Medicine, there are various basic principles that have been refined throughout thousands of years of practice. Amongst the essential tenets of health is the flow of life force throughout the body. Medical complaints are said to be caused by disruptions to this particular flow, as the body's energy balance becomes disrupted. Practitioners of Traditional Chinese Medicine believe that interruptions in the flow of qi affect particular organs and hence; all symptoms could be connected and traced back to a particular organ.

Qi follows an assortment of meridians, or major pathways as it flows throughout the body. Each and every meridian carries qi in various ways to various organs. When an Acupressure practitioner analyzes a condition, they know particularly what meridian is damaged. The meridians of the body are broken up into a detailed series of pressure points. These points are physically controlled in order to treat different indications. These pressure points are found by locating the meridian and making use of specific parts of the body as landmarks.

For a normal Acupressure session, customers are asked to lie on a table draped or blanketed with sheets. Some practitioners will work on fully clothed customers, while some prefer to work directly on the skin. When the session is blended with Western massage methods, undressing is more common, even if, no massage therapist will ask the client to go past their comfort level. During the session, the practitioner often takes a few quick passes over the customer in order to familiarize themselves with the customer, while asking concerning specific concerns she or he is experiencing.

The Acupressure therapist then makes use of different degrees of pressure on specific pressure points on the body. Depending upon the requirements of the client and the preferences of the practitioner, hands, elbows and likewise some tools may be utilized to be able to apply a certain amount of pressure. The flow of the client's qi is intended to even out over the course of the treatment, and hopefully, relief is brought to the indications which the customer has mentioned. These sessions could be very energizing and likewise therapeutic, usually the client goes through a flood of emotion.
